I. The Architectural Marvels: Why "The White City" is More Than a Nickname

Chicago's nickname, "The White City," isn't just a poetic flourish; it's directly linked to its breathtaking architecture. The city's iconic skyline is largely composed of buildings clad in limestone, a material chosen for its durability, elegance, and the stunning white hue it lends to the structures. This wasn't a random choice; it was a conscious architectural decision that shaped the city's visual identity.

The Burnham Plan and its Legacy: The 1893 World's Columbian Exposition, often referred to as the "White City" Exposition, played a pivotal role in shaping Chicago's architectural destiny.
